E.

E, the second vowel, and the fifth letter, of the English alphabet. Its long and natural sound in English, as in here, me, coincides with the sound of i in the Italian and French languages. It has a short sound, as in met, men; and the sound of a open or long, in prey, vein. As a final letter, it is generally quiescent; but it serves to lengthen the sound of the preceding vowel, or, at least, to indicate that the preceding vowel is to have its long sound, as in mane, cane, plume, which, without the final e, would be pronounced man, can, plum. After c and g, the final e serves to indicate that c is to be pronounced as s, and g as j. As a numeral, E stands for 250. In the calendar it is the fifth of the dominical letters. As an abbreviation, it stands for East, as in charts, E. N. E., east northeast; E. S. E., east southeast; E. by S., east by south.
